WORKING PAPERS

"Macroeconomic Regulations and Adjustment Speed of Listed Real Estate Companies' Capital Structure", Undergraduate thesis, 2015.

This thesis studies China's real estate companies' capital structure adjustment behavior in the aspect of macroeconomic regulations. The study finds that the adjustment speed is higher under stimulating policy. Both stimulating and restraining policies can affect the short-term debt financing, and internal retained earnings are the fastest option to optimize capital structures, but the mixed path is the most efficient option.

"Dependence of Labor Migration Decision-Making in China's Urbanization" (in Chinese), with Birong Yang and Yong You, ZJU research project, 2015.

The study tries to clarify how much does labor migration decision-making depend on social interaction between individuals. After analyzing CHIPs data with a Probit model, we find that peer effects exist in the decision-making of labor migration. The influence of peer effects on individual migration decision-making connects with the social interaction between individuals and other members of the community.
